Precisely; there is no reason to suppose that the grain of any species of wood has differed from its progenitors. From the descriptions we have of Roman houses, they must have been very elegant. The Romans imported all they chose, or could afford, from conquered nations. But you know Tyre possessed similar magnificence in the time of Ezekiel, till it was destroyed by Alexander the Great. Indeed, perhaps Tyre suggested some of those very luxuries which were spread abroad after his death. The Chinese boast of four evidences of early civilization: that they sat on chairs, ate off tables, burned wax candles, and clothed the whole body, long before such tilings were customary elsewhere; and when we see their beautiful inlaid cabinets and tables; porcelain vases, cups and saucers; ivory fans, and toys of...
